Energy

The energy landscape in the Eurasia region has changed rapidly over the past decade, with developments giving Turkey a critical role. Turkey has become an energy hub by being a transit country for oil and natural gas supplies from Russia, the Caspian region and the Middle East to Europe. Significant pipeline projects such as the Southern Gas Corridor and TurkStream, as well as political developments such as the integration of Iran and the Iraq Regional Government into international markets, demonstrate that Ankara will increase its influence over energy policies in the region.

Due to energy projects' impact on geopolitics, intergovernmental relations, and economic growth, these projects require developing and executing well-crafted public affairs strategies. StratejiCo. advises energy companies on government relations, communications, and community engagement activities to realize highly important projects.
